

Helix Formation

Square-well homopolymers use only isotropic interactions, but if they are stiffened slightly, they break chiral symmetry and fold into left or right handed helices. This suggests a fundamental reason as to why the helix is such a common motif in natural systems, as it is the optimal packing of a stiff string structure.

